

SKorea: Jump in COVID-19 cases after outbreaks in Christian schools

SEOUL (Reuters) - South Korean authorities were scrambling on Wednesday to contain coronavirus outbreaks centered around Christian schools as the country reported a jump in infections, dampening hopes of a speedy exit from a third wave of the pandemic.

A total of 297 COVID-19 cases had been traced to six churches and mission schools run by a Christian organization, senior health official Yoon Tae-ho told a briefing.

More than 100 cases were confirmed overnight among people linked to a church and its mission school in Gwangju, about 270 km (168 miles) south of Seoul, officials said. Another 171 cases had been linked to an affiliated school in the city of Daejeon since Jan. 17.

The Korea Disease Control and Prevention Agency said the Daejeon mission school outbreak appeared to have been spreading for some time before it was detected.

The Christian organization responsible for the facilities, International Mission, was ordered to test everyone linked to 32 of its 40 schools and churches around the country.

the outbreak. It said that while some infected students may have been asymptomatic, it had also failed to require students with cold-like symptoms to get tested.

"We deeply apologize for not responding earlier and for thinking the students could have had a cold when a student first developed fever," it said in a statement.

The organization said it would submit a full list of students and staff in its schools nationwide.

Prime Minister Chung Sye-kyun called on people affiliated with the affected facilities to get tested.

"The key is speed. I call on the authorities and local governments to make all-out efforts to identify related facilities and prevent further transmission," Chung told a government briefing.

The KDCA reported 559 new cases as of midnight on Tuesday, up from 354 a day before, bringing the national tally to 76,429 infections with 1,378 deaths.

India's farmers clash with police, swarm Delhi as protests mount

Thousands of Indian farmers on Tuesday escalated protests to revoke controversial agricultural laws, clashing with police and storming key landmarks in New Delhi to pressure Prime Minister Narendra Modi.

The farmers, who have camped at various border points around the capital for two months, had permission to demonstrate after the completion of an annual military parade to mark Republic Day, a major public holiday in India. But many gathered early in the day and broke through barricades on the outskirts of the city, prompting police to deploy tear gas in some areas.

Television footage showed thousands of protesters clashing with police in central Delhi before reaching the iconic Red Fort, where Indian prime ministers typically address the nation on the country's independence day in August. It remained unclear if the farmers, many of whom gathered peacefully, would camp out in the middle of Delhi or return to locations outside the city where they had been staying.

"We are talking to the farmers - we are convincing them to go back," said Depender Pathak, special commissioner of police. "We have faith in farmers. This is an unprecedented situation."

India's federal home ministry suspended mobile internet services in some parts of the city where the protests were most tense. Several metro stations were also shut down.

Farmer leaders called on protesters to stay peaceful, warning that any violence could hurt their cause.

"For the last two months, the entire country and the world has been saying that the peaceful nature of these farmers protests is their strength," said Yogendra Yadav, leader of Sanyukt Kisan Morcha, an umbrella organization of several dozen farm groups leading the protests. "If this peace breaks down, our strength will take a hit."

Leaders of the protests have rejected Modi's offers to temporarily shelve the three laws passed in September that overhauled the way farm goods are sold in the country of more than 1.3 billion people, almost half of whom depend on agriculture for their livelihood. The government has defended the legislation, saying they would eliminate middlemen in state-run wholesale markets, increase earnings for farmers and make India more self-reliant.
